However, historical documents show a much different side of Marie Antoinette.

“Let them eat cake.” This phrase is often used to symbolize the gap between the rich and the poor. (①) Though it is often reported that Marie Antoinette originally said it, this is actually a myth. (②) The saying first appeared in an autobiography by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, which was written when Marie Antoinette was just nine years old and lived in Austria. (③) Nobody knows why she became associated with the phrase, but, as a result, people today believe she was a cruel and thoughtless woman. (④) For instance, there is a letter she wrote to her family in Austria to describe an ongoing food shortage in France. (⑤) In the letter, she wrote, “It is quite certain that in seeing the people who treat us so well despite their own misfortune, we are more obliged than ever to work hard for their happiness.”

They show great respect to human bodies because they are considered gifts from their forefathers.

Famadihana is a unique ritual practiced by the people of Madagascar to celebrate their ancestors. It is a festival held once every seven years. During the celebration, a Malagasy family enters the tombs of its ancestors and brings out their bones to be wrapped in fresh cloth. (①) Following this, music is played, and people dance with the remains of their dead relatives. (②) The people of Madagascar believe that humans are not made from dust, but from the bodies of their ancestors. (③) They also believe that the dead remain in the world until their bodies break down completely. (④) Until this happens, the dead are able to receive and enjoy the love shown to them during Famadihana. (⑤)

But, as surprising as it sounds, scientists studying the poisoned water learned that the pit may actually serve a useful purpose.

Would you pay money to see a giant pool of toxic waste? If so, you should head to Berkeley Pit in Butte, Montana. Now a popular tourist attraction, it was originally a copper mine. The pit is a mile long, 1,780 feet deep, and filled with toxic water. When it was a functioning mine, workers simply collected the copper directly from the water. (①) If you were foolish enough to drink some of this water, it would make a hole in your stomach. (②) In 1995, more than 300 migrating geese made the mistake of landing at Berkeley Pit. (③) Before long, they were all dead. (④) They discovered new types of bacteria living in this tough environment. (⑤) These bacteria produce chemicals that may someday be used for fighting cancer.

For this reason, the birds were included on the list, and they were targeted by the government.

The Four Pests Campaign was begun in 1958 by Chinese leader Mao Zedong. The purpose of the program was to get rid of four creatures that were considered harmful to people, and three of these were obvious choices: mosquitoes, flies, and rats. However, you may feel that Mao's fourthly designated pest, the sparrow, does not seem as harmful. (①) But Mao suspected that sparrows consumed seeds planted by Chinese farmers. (②) People were instructed to chase them away or kill them on sight. (③) The campaign was completed successfully, making sparrows nearly extinct in China. (④) Unfortunately, this led to severe ecological imbalance. (⑤) In addition to eating seeds, sparrows also fed on locusts. With the birds gone, the locust population in China exploded. It caused farmers to lose large amounts of their grain, which resulted in a serious food famine in China.

Recently, a study was conducted on the difference in pain tolerance between athletes and non-athletes. The results showed that the athletes were able to tolerate higher levels of pain. According to the researchers, this is because they make use of certain cognitive strategies to deal with the pain. For example, some athletes are immersed so deeply in the physical act they are performing that they are able to ignore the pain. Another strategy is one in which athletes focus on a positive thought to distract them from negative feelings of pain. The researchers believe that this kind of resistance to pain is something that can be learned over time. As athletes are often incredibly motivated to win a game or set a record in their event, they seem to be more likely to adopt these techniques.

Athletes can ____ (A) ____ pain better than others because they learn to use ____ (B) ____ techniques that allow them to focus on something else.

Let's say there was a man who had a crush on one of his classmates in university. She was on the soccer team, and her uniform number was 36. As his feelings for her grew, he began to notice something strange. Wherever he looked, he saw the number 36. It was in books, on signs, and on price tags. However, this wasn't an amazing coincidence. It was simply due to an illusion called the Baader-Meinhof phenomenon. After you notice something for the first time, it suddenly seems to appear with increasing frequency. This gives you the feeling that you are seeing it everywhere you go. But this occurs only because you are actively looking for it without realizing it. In the man's case, the number 36 had always been all around him-he just wasn't paying any attention to it. But when it suddenly became significant to him, he began to notice it everywhere.

The Baader-Meinhof phenomenon is a condition in which people suddenly become more aware of the ____ (A) ____ of something because they have recently been ____ (B) ____ about it unconsciously.

Surprisingly, some scientists interested in learning more about animal evolution and adaptation are moving their studies to the big cities. This is because animals in these areas must find ways to deal with life in an unusual environment. For example, some species of fish in a New York City river have evolved a resistance to a certain kind of toxic pollution. Along with evolution, urban animals also undergo behavioral changes to survive in big cities. Some, such as crows, have even found ways to use human technology to their advantage. When unable to open a hard nut, birds will usually drop them from great heights. But crows in Tokyo use an easier method: they place the nuts in the street and wait for passing cars to run them over.

Animals can adjust to living in ____ (A) ____ areas by ____ (B) ____ their behavioral patterns as well as by evolving.

For many years, marketers have sent emails to consumers as a form of advertising, but very few people actually open these emails. However, according to one marketing specialist, this isn't actually a problem. Even an unopened email can be an effective marketing tool by creating awareness of the advertiser's brand. A study shows that unopened marketing emails still help boost sales. On average, people who receive them will spend more on the company's products than people who get no such emails. Obviously, it is important for the advertiser to include their brand name in the subject line of the email. This way, it will be visible to the consumer even if he or she fails to open the message.

An advertising email with the brand name in the title can result in a ____ (A) ____ even if the receiver does not ____ (B) ____ the email.

Imagine two hedgehogs in winter. If they keep close together, they'll stay warm; but each may also be injured by the other's sharp spines.

- (A) So, what is the solution? Should you keep close relationships and risk hurting each other? Or should you remain remote from everyone and live in loneliness? It's important to find the right balance in your relationships. Showing respect to your loved ones is probably a good start.
- (B) This is known as the hedgehog's dilemma, and it's possible to view human relationships the same way. It can feel good to have a close relationship with someone. Unfortunately, this also puts you in danger of hurting that person and having your own feelings wounded.
- (C) For example, you may often become angry with your mom or your best friend. You may even say mean things to them, expecting them to understand that you are just upset. On the other hand, you're probably more forgiving of people who you aren't close with.

밑줄 친 borrow third-party influence가 다음 글에서 의미하는 바로 가장 적절한 것은?

Imagine you're trying to decide which of three laptops to purchase online. The first has many reviews and a high rating; the second has fewer reviews and a low rating; and the third has no reviews at all. Chances are that you will select the one with the most satisfied customers. This is due to something called social proof, a psychological phenomenon based on the idea that people strive to conform to social norms. Marketers use it to more or less borrow third-party influence in the interest of luring new customers. Shoppers who are undecided about which product to buy are easily swayed by the reviews and recommendations of other people who have bought the items they are considering. This is why companies are so eager to persuade their customers to leave reviews—the social proof they create is an invaluable selling point.

- ① consult industry professionals
- ② upgrade customer service policies
- ③ utilize the reviews of past customers
- ④ create false reviews of their products
- ⑤ recommend websites to customers
